BOOING EDUCATION ENTRAPMENT

Despite the efforts of the Department of Education and Culture (DepED), the lack of deaf-friendly schools and the high dropout rate among deaf students remains a significant issue.

He explained that there are only a few vocational schools for deaf students, and that most of these are located in the cities. "Deaf students often have to travel long distances to attend these schools, and this can be a major challenge," he said.

An increase in awareness and understanding is necessary to address these issues. It is crucial that deaf-friendly schools are established in every region of the country to ensure that all deaf students have access to quality education and vocational training. This will help to ensure that deaf students have equal opportunities to succeed in their chosen careers and contribute to society.
